A SUPER CANNON?

Marshalltown, Iowa — At first glance this might appear to be one of the Nazi's "super big Berthas" poised on the French coast, with smoke pouring from its elevated muzzle. Actually it was an engineering feat here at Marshalltown, for the 12 foot iron stack weighing many tons was hoisted from its base in one piece and lowered to the ground by a giant crane. This is the first time in the middle west that the job of tearing down a smoke stack was accomplished in this manner. A new stack seven feet in diameter was hoisted the same way. Circle and arrow indicate where stack was removed.

BOMBS DEMONSTRATED

Fort Lewis, Wash.—As a part of the 4th Army maneuvers here, men of Fort Lewis watched a demonstration of the deadly "Molotov Cocktails" in combating enemy tanks. The "cocktail" is a bottle filled with gasoline, wrapped in gasoline soaked cotton waste and lighted. This is thrown aflame at oncoming tanks in "fox-holes," in which the infantrymen crouch, and which now take the place of old trenches. When the bottle strikes the tank, it breaks and showers the iron monster with flaming gasoline, literally roasting alive the men inside. Photo shows soldier in fox-hole after throwing gas-bottles at an old World War tank, now no longer of any use, which was used as a "dummy."
