SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 19.

ROANOKE, THE HUB.

Now and then some of our esteemed contemporaries raise the cry that too many small towns are springing up all around us, that the citizens of Roanoke should keep their energy and capital at home and not go outside to invest it. They seem to look on these towns as possible rivals of this city and think that we should not help them ou.

The TIMES does not think this is the best policy. In every section of the North there are numbers of small towns and villages, they are scattered through the country at intervals of six or sever miles, all being tributary to some large city in the section. These small places will not hurt Roanoke in the least, rather they will help her; they will be the spokes in the great wheel of South west Virginia, of which this city will be the hub.

This great section is not only to be a mining and agricultural country, but more than that it is to be a great manufacturing centre, and as this becomes more and more patent, it will be seen that small towns will become :

Our esteemed contemporary, the Roanoke Dally Times, in answer to our request to state whether or not it referred to Fredericksburg when it made some slighting remarks about "ancient, anti-bellum cities," says, if the cap fits we can put it on and wear

We are pleased to say that the cap doesn't fit us; that Fredericksburg is no mushroom city; that she existed years before Roanoke was heard of; that recently a gentleman of this city purchased ten agree of land within the

We are sorry to see it, Colonel, but it does begin to look as if the cap does fit after all; that in your zeal to boom your home, you have fallen into the very thing you plead not gullty of. You accuse the Times of slighting remarks thout the "ancient anti-bellum cities" of the State, and in the afternoon.
