A LITTLE NONSENSE.

Mr. Sixawee's Pocketbook Had a Pretty Flat Look.

Mr. Sixawee arrived there the other evening about half an hour ahead of time, and she was still engaged in curling her naturally wavy hair. Her little brother, however, met Mr. Sixawee in the hall.

"Mr. Sixawee," said the little brother, wriggling bashfully, "did the elephant step on it?"

"Did the elephant step on what, Willie?"

"Your pocketbook."

"Why—er—what do you mean by that, son?"

"Oh, nothing, only sis, she said to maw th' other afternoon that ev'ry time she'd gone out with you your pocketbook looked like a elephant had stepped on it, an I jes' wanted to see it, that's all."

And when she came down stairs about five minutes later she couldn't understand why Mr. Sixawee was looking fixedly at an album that was turned upside down.—Washington Post.

A Story Without Words.

As Amended.

"Oh, you dear, good thing!" she murmured as her husband handed her $50 for a new gown.

"That remark," sighed the other half of the combination, "is slightly twisted."

"Why, what do you mean?" asked the wife.

"You probably meant to say," replied the so called head of the house, "that you are dear and I am a good thing."—Chicago News.

A Practical Adviser.

Miss Romancie—Oh, I just adore music!

Old Baldie—You play, I believe?

Miss Romancie—Play and sing, both. What sort of a man ought a woman who loves music to marry?

Old Baldie—Well—er—I really can't say—a deaf one, I suppose.—New York Weekly.

Sure of His Man.

Visitor—You and your brother are twins, are you not, my boy?

Boy—Yes, sir. It's hard to be twins.

Visitor—How is that?

Boy—When father don't know which of us does a thing, he thrashes both.—Tit-Bits.

A Profane Husband.

Miss Church—Why do you think that Mrs. Shutter's husband is a profane man?

Mrs. Hendershot—Because whenever she has a carpet for him to put down she makes him fill his mouth with tacks.—Town and Country.

Trimming Her Sails a Bit.

Nannie—Oh, dear, my face is so freckled! It's just awful!

Aunt Hannah—I wouldn't fret, Nannie. Of course the freckles are not very becoming, but then, you know, they serve to cover up your features.—Boston Transcript.

Between Feminine Friends.

"I wish," remarked the girl in gray, "that I knew how to become a hypnotist."

"Some of us," returned the girl in blue, "are able to get married without resorting to the aid of hypnotism."—Chicago Post.
