Climatic Conditions Excellent For Growing Cotton, For Which Is Made "Ivory" For The Toilet

COTTON is destined to become one of the big crops in the El Paso territory. In the opinion of Roland Harwell, director of the chamber of commerce agricultural bureau, Mr. Harwell has been watching the experiments of the Ivy-Toilet company in the Torollie district with cotton, and he says the results were highly satisfactory.

"This company," said Mr. Harwell, "has been enlarging its acreage until it now covers about 100 acres. Their efforts are being duplicated by the people of the district with similar success."

"Climatic Conditions Suitable." Cotton of the Mexican variety will grow here readily. It is medium-staple and produces about one and one-half bales. Its limit of alkali tolerance is higher than practically any crop grown here. It is also highly valuable in reclaiming areas from weed pastures.

"The chamber of commerce has the United States weather bureau to find out how much time there is on an average between the last killing frost of the spring and the first in the fall, for shortness of season has retarded attempts here to grow cotton. He found that the last killing frost of spring usually was around March 28 and the first killing frost of autumn around November 10, allowing sufficient time for the growth of medium staple cotton."

"Heavy" From Cotton. In speculation on the usefulness of cotton in manufacture the fact was brought up that this textile was used now in the making of toilet tissue, imitation ivory. Many an "ivory" mirror, or comb and brush, held in the hand of millions goes through the process of being made from cotton.

In its metamorphosis from cotton plant to brush and mirror, combs, combs and also horns the material is changed by camphor, certain acids and solvents and the various dyes used in securing the color effects.

Through Long Process. The first step toward the powder is that of being converted into a paste. This has been found the most economical method in use.

The paste is dried and dusted, the paper is immersed in a mixture of nitric and sulphuric acid. Through washing this removes any free acid left from the nitration. The next process removes the water. The former paper is at this stage in a soluble state.

Trees is a stabilizing material used, and after this the camphor and alcohol are added, and also the coloring matter, the mass is ground together until it attains the consistency of tooth powder.

It is called Proxylite. Proxylite is the name of this compound. In its pure state it is translucent, but when the tints and coloring effects, coloring matter is introduced during the mixing process and the mass is ground together until it attains the consistency of tooth powder.

Smoothness and the desired consistency is secured by working the mass through large rollers after which it is subjected to hydraulic pressure and moulded into cakes in metal forms.

For being subjected to heat from 5,000 of an inch up, the ivory is then hung up to "season." After this comes the polishing.
