CHAPTER VI.

THE young people assembled slowly at the dance that evening. Toward dark it had begun raining, and, according to custom, two livery stable carriages, called "ricks," were engaged to convey all the couples to and from the house.

Everything in life is relative, and to young people who often went to even less pretentious entertainments, this affair was rather impressive in its elegance. Lamps shone everywhere, and the music of mandolins blazed and spluttered in a room hung about with evergreens. The girls were becomingly attired in light evening gowns, and many of them were good looking, refined and graceful. All were soft spoken and easy in their manners and either wore married dresses, or the evening suits of the young men were well in evidence and more noticeable to the wearers themselves than they would have been to a spectator used to conventional styles of dress. They could be seen in all stages of inadaptability to figures too large or too small, and even after the dance began there were several couples and a due amount of conversation on the improvement from the appreciative fair sex. The young men accompanying each young man had passed a small bouquet on his arm, so that it would have been impossible to tell whether a man had a natural taste for flowers or was the willing victim to a taste higher than his own.

Barbara Miller and Alan sat smoking and talking in the room of the hotel till past 9 o'clock, and then they went down. As a general rule, the young men were expected to escort their dates to dances when the young men went at all, but Alan was often excused from so doing on account of living in the country, and Miller had been down every precedent in that respect and never invited a girl to go with him. He atoned for this shortcoming by contributing most liberally to every entertainment given by the young people, even when he was out of town. He used to say he liked to "come and addle at such things and feel free to go to bed or business at will."

As the two friends entered the big hall, Alan asked the girl about whom he had been thinking all day. She was seated at one of the deep, lace-curtained tables behind the piano. Frank Hillhouse was just presenting to her a daintily attired traveling salesman. At this juncture one of the four managers with a white rosette on his lapel called Miller away to ask his advice about some details, and Alan followed him out into the wide corridor which ran through the house. He had no obedience to another man's command, and he was not in the least interested in the traveling salesman's so-called business, and it would be impossible for a resident gentleman to intrude himself upon a stranger who had just been introduced to a lady. So he went down to the ground floor and stood in the office. It was full of tobacco smoke and a throng of men, some of whom were from the country and others from the town drawn to the hotel for the festivities. From the office a door opened into a bar and billiard room, whence came the clinking of ivory balls and the grumbling of cues. Another door led into the large dining room, which had been cleared of its tables that it might be used for dancing. There were a sawing of fiddles, the twanging of guitars, the clink of tinware and the grumbling of a bass viol. The musicians, black and yellow, occupied chairs on one of the tables, which had been placed against the wall, and one of the four managers was engaged in waiting paraffin candles over the bar and rubbing it in with his feet. Seeing what he was doing, some of the young men, desirous of trying their new patent leather pumps, came in and began to waltz singly and in couples.

When everything was in readiness, the four managers plotted the dancers downstairs. From the office Alan saw them filing into the big room and taking seats in the chairs arranged against the walls on all sides. He saw Frank Hillhouse and Dolly Barclay sit down near the band; the salesman had disappeared. Alan threw his cigar away and went straight to her.

"Oh, here you are," laughed Frank Hillhouse as Alan shook hands with her. "I told Miss Dolly coming on that the west wind would blow you this way, and when I saw Ray Miller just now I knew you'd struck the town."

"It wasn't exactly the wind," replied Alan. "I'm afraid you will forget me if I stay on the farm all the time."

"We certainly are glad to have you," smiled Miss Barclay.

"I knew she'd say that—I knew it. I knew it," said Hillhouse. "A girl can always think of nicer things to say to a fellow than his rival can. Old Squire Trubee was teasing me the other day about how hard you was to beat, Bishop, but I told him the bigger the war the more victory for somebody, and, as the fellow said, I tote fair and am aboveboard."

Alan greeted this with an all but visible shudder. There was much in his dignified bearing and good appearance to commend him to the preference of any thinking woman, especially when contrasted to Hillhouse, who was only a little taller than Dolly and was showing himself even at a greater disadvantage in his unrefined allusions to his and Alan's attentions to her. Indeed Alan was sorry for the spectacle the fellow was making of himself and tried to pass it over.
