FARMINGTON TAKES A LEADING PLACE IN RAISING APPLES FOR EXPORT.

Back in 1872 a picturesque home was occupied on the south side of a large apple orchard, holding about 100 acres of apples. The orchard was one of the most productive in the state, and the home was occupied by the owners. The orchard was later sold to a Mr. Thompson, who built a new house on the property, and the old house was destroyed.

Now the orchard is again in the hands of the family, and the house is again occupied by the owners. The orchard is again in its prime, and the house is again the center of the farm. The orchard is now owned by Mr. Thompson, and the house is again occupied by him and his family. The orchard is again the center of the farm, and the house is again the home of the owners.

In short, the orchard is again in the hands of the family, and the house is again occupied by them. The orchard is again in its prime, and the house is again the center of the farm. The orchard is again owned by Mr. Thompson, and the house is again occupied by him and his family. The orchard is again the center of the farm, and the house is again the home of the owners.
