SAILING. N. C. USHER. A sunlit bay=
The distance gray
Bodes stormy weather;
A tishing-boat
And we afloat

A laugh so sweet, And she so discreetly So grave and shy That by and by I'm lost completely.

The line wont go-Her head bent low, A golden glory; Her hand near mine, , touch divine-The old, old story.

Still worse the knot, The line forgot-A happy lover! The sky grows red, And overhead The sea birds hover.

The sunlight fades
To eve's dim shades,

Long years have gone, We still sail on Through life together; And side by side, Till death divide, All storms we'll weather.

The shadows gray

The shadows gray
Oft cross the way
To life immortal;
Each grows more dear
As we draw near
The golden portal.

PREDESTINATION.

How a Yenng Servian Officer Outwitted a Would-be Oracle.

sometimes happened that I was bliged to pass fifteen days at a stretch mong the Cossack villages on the left flank of the army line in company with a pattalion of infantry. The officers of lifferent regiments often gathered in the evenings and enjoyed the night gaming. One evening, tired out with Boston, I threw my eards on the table and went to that in the corner with Maj. S.—. The conversation, contrary to the usual custom, grew agreeable and very interesting. One of the party contended that the Mohammedan belief, which decreed that the fate of man was written in heaven, found many converts in the Russian ranks. Finally, all the party dropped their cards and commenced to relate anecdotes tending to the

At this an officer—seated in an obscure corner of the room—rose and advanced to the center of the circle and gazed upon us Bahneman was heard before Judge Lehment-like complexion, brown hair, eyes black and penetrating, large but regular nose—a peculiarity of his race; a cold, sad smile eternally playing over his thin lips. He was a man noted for bravery; talked but little but with vivacity when he spoke, and never had revealed any soul secrets nor his family affairs. He drank but little wine. As to the Cossack girls, whose charms are celebrated, he never flirted or made love. It was said, however, that his colonel's wife silently adored him. If so, alitch entered an adjoining cotta ge him. He looked at the walls, upon which hung numerous side-arms. He pulled from a peg a pair of large pistols in holsters.

As yet the company did not comprehend his meaning. Then he cocked the pistols and placed them at his head. We seized his arms, crying: "What do you intend to do? This is foolishness." "Gentlemen," he exclaimed, "who wins the bet? Who owes me 20 ducats?" We all withdrew outside to the bivouac

We all withdrew outside to the broad fire. He made a sign for us to be seated around him, and we obeyed in silence. At that moment he seemed to exert more mystrational sign and the seemed to exert more mystrational sign and the seemed to exert more mystrational sign and the seemed to the selection of the school of which she was charge of the school of which she was charged the school of the school of which she was charged the school of the school of which she was charged the school of the school of which she was charged the school of the school terious influence over us. I regarded him fixedly, and his glance was firmly fixed on me. His pale lips smiled slightly, and, on his pale visage. I have often observed, and many old army officers will confirm this remark, that death may be read on the night. The flames were discovered before confounded with the ordinary aspect.
"You will die to-morrow," I said, gazing

He looked at me calmly and replied with He looked at me calmly and replied with one of his cold smiles: "Perhaps yes, perhaps no!" Then turning to Maj. S—— he asked. "The pistols you wrenched from my hands were loaded?" "Well loaded. Voulitch." answered one of the young officers. "But your pretended attempt to blow your brains out was a mere pleasanty."

"Foolish pleasantry!" said another.
"I will bet 50 roubles against 5 that the pistois were not loaded!" exclaimed a third.

A new bet was made. These interrup-

A new bet was made. These interruptions annoyed me.

"Listen!" said I. "He should either blow out his brains or his predestination theory; or, if the pistols are unloaded, he must hang them against the wall."

"That's the idea!" laughed a chorus of voices.

They handed him the pistols.

"Gentlemen, don't budge!" observed
Voulitch, quietly applying the mouth of one muzzle to his forehead and the other against his ear.

We moved back in the circle, petrified.

"Lieut Patchorin toes a card in the air."

"Lieut. Petchorin, toss a card in the air," continued the Servian.

I took a card from the green board and threw it up in the air. The crowd of officers | C. Squire and Thomas Carey. held their breaths, their eyes bulged out with agitation and morbid curiosity. The card floated away from Voulitch and his pistols. At the same instant both pistol hammers fell, one even slightly flashing its erected a large substantial building near

"Thanks be to God!" exclaimed several ices, drawing in by inspiration of breath.
"The pistols are unloaded," I remarked,

"No," observed I. "This was perfectly fair. for they are my pistols and I never took my eyes off them since Voulitch seized the weapons. He is only a lucky better,"

"It is the first time in my life that I ever

He gazed at me after this query and continued: "Let me ask you why you and continued: "Let me ask you way you seem to regard my death as certain to-morrow?" His eyes glittered as he spoke, in anger. He had lost his temper. "As our wager is settled," he added, "your remarks on my death to-morrow were uncalled for." Then, without inishing his observation, he suddenly pulled his hat down over his eyes and walked away from the circle

After his departure we all discussed what we termed the excitability of Voulitch; and they unanimously pronounced me a sublime egotist because I bet against a man who evi-dently wished to kill himself—as though he could not have found a suitable occasion without me. I returned home through the deserted streets of the Cossack village. The deserted streets of the Cossack village. The chimes rang out from a small Russian church surmounted by its short spire and belfry. It struck 11 o'clock and three quarters. I hurried my footsteps. Suddenly a sharp report of a pistol echoed around the corner; cries were heard, and several guards and sentries with lanterns ran rapidly past me. I turned the neighboring street. Under the moonlight was a small group of soldiers, holding up the inanimate figure of an officer. On my approach the Cossacks, with all the respect they have for their superior officers, moved aside to allow my entrance to the circle. The dead man was Voulitch, his circle. The dead man was Voulitch, his dark, dead eyes widely extended as if gaz-ing steadfastly at the eternal stars; a large bullet-hole was apparent in his forehead and a sluggish stream of blood ran down his nose and chin. In one hand he had a pistol, in the other was a tightly-grasped note. The note was addressed to Lieut. Petchorin—to myself. I tore the wrapper hastily and read;

Lieut. Petchorin: You said I would die to-morrow. I could have waited until to-morrow to show you that a man, to a cer-tain extent, controls his own destiny, but I die to-night by my own hand to prove that you are not an oracle. Keep your pistols in good order, so that you may not lose your money again. Had they been carefully cared for and properly loaded my fate was sealed. Farewell, Petchorin; nor sigh for the unfortunate VOULITCH.

"Take his body to the church!" said I, calmly, "and inform the colonel and his wife of this young officer's death." I saw them wrap his remains in his cloak and bear him away. Then, looking up at the stars, which beamed above so brightly, I moved homeward, wondering what the spirit of Voulitch was now engaged in doing.

T. S. Godfrey et al., Surviving Partners, vs. Jerome Templeton, Administrator, etc., et al.

PURSUANT to a decree pronounced in the above cause, at the September Special Term, 1885, of the Chancery Court at Knoxville, Tennessee, I will sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, on the premises, ON FRIDAY, THE 27TH DAY OF NOVEMBER NEXT, AT 11 O'CLOCK A. M., the property in the pleadings mentioned, consisting of a lease for mining and quarrying marble, for fifteen years, from May 18,1850, upon the lands mentioned in said lease, situated adjacent to the town of Concord, Knox county, Tennessee, and all the machinery and appliances thereon belonging to the firm of Brown, Godfrey & Co.

These are by far the most extensive quarries in the state of Tennessee, and their products placed upon the market during the past ten years aggregate an amount nearly equal to those of all the other quarries combined. They are located directly upon the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railroad, and the facilities with which the blocks are quarried and handled cannot be surpassed. They are comparatively inexhaustible and produce all the most profitable varieties of marble, and of most excellent quality. The senior member of the firm having died, they are sold to divide the estate. ON FRIDAY, THE 27TH DAY OF NOVEMBER

TERMS: Ten per cent. will be required in cash and the remainder on a credit of 6. 12. 13 and 24 months—the purchaser giving notes with approved security, bearing interest from date, and a lien retained as further security. S. P. EVANS.
