The St. Paul team played its firs game under the new management yes terday, but it had the same old luck a of yore. The men batted harder than their opponents, fielded quite as well ran the bases in better form than usual and made plenty of noise on the coach lines, but at the end of the ninth inning the figures on the black board were Minneapolis 5, St. Paul 4. The elements, too, were against the local treasury, for just at the hour when people were preparing to go out to the grounds Jupiter Pluviu turned the hose on mother eart receipts. With a clear day the amount taken at the gate would have reache $1,000; as it was, only about 600 or 70 people saw the contest. The ground were in execrable condition. Ther were ponds of water all over the out field, and the base lines were so stick; that the players found sprinting ver difficult. The moisture, too, had a ba effect on the ball, keeping it so soggy was hard to drive it out of the diame The game, however, was so close th it was full of excitement. From the third inning the teams were never more than a run apart and twice there was a tie. The Flour City nine really won the game on Murphy's failure to hold Carroll's fly, which was followed by a home run by Minnehan. Later on Burks' anxiety to make a pretty play resulted in an error and a run for the Millers. Still later Mains and Broughton between them permitted Hengle to steal third, from which point he scored the winning run. Rourke neatly cut off two base hits in right by nipping the batsmen at first, and Farmer batted the ball hard and often. The visitors played a fair all-around game. Minnehan made a great catch on the left foul line, and Miner executed one of the most remarkable throws ever seen on the diamond. After catching a fly he attempted to double up a runner at first, but threw the ball wide somewhere in the neighborhood of twenty feet. The teams play in Minneapolis this afternoon, the batteries being Meekin and Broughton, and Hudson and Dugdale. The score more than a run apart and twice ther batteries being Meekin and Broughton, and Hudson and Dugdale. The score

BENEFIT TO THE MANAGEMENT. On Saturday afternoon the new management of the base ball team will be given a benefit at Athletic park. The men who have taken hold of the team are anxious for an opportunity to give St. Paul as good ball as is to be had; but to do this they must have money. The benefit is to give the public a chance to show its appreciation of the effort. Tickets will be placed on sale to-day or to-morrow, and everybody who takes an interest in the game

Omaha Gets a Game With a Home Umpire.

OMAHA, June 29 .- The local "fans" were warm over Atwood's umpiring vesterday, and insisted on putting in McKelvey, a local man, to-day, although Secretary Roche refused to order At wood elsewhere. To an unprejudiced outsider it looked very much as though McKelvey proposed to give the game to Omaha. The Cornhuskers were, however, badly off in their fielding, and l and Brooklyn played a game here to-day in about the most oppressive weather ever known here for base ball. Brooklyn proved an easy victim. McCullough and Toy for Brooklyn and Meakin, Enret and Weckbecker were the batteries. Ehret took Meakin's place at the end of the seventh. Mc-Cullough was hit very freely, while the visitors were unable to hit either of Louisville's pitchers, making no hit off Ehret. Attendance, 3,483. Score:

Toledo, O., June 29.—The game between Toledo and the Athletics was stopped at the end of the fourth inning by rain, when the score stood 4 to 1 in favor of Toledo.

COLUMBUS, O., June 29.—The Columbus-Syracuse game was stopped by rain during the third unning. Columbus had one run, Syracuse nothing. It will be played off to-morrow.

Base Ballists Arrested and Fined

Lightly. WASHINGTON, June 29.—During the progress of to-day's ball game between Washington and Worcester clubs at the Gentlemen's driving park, near Alexandria, Va., Sheriff Beach, of Alexandria county, accompanied by Justice of the Peace Drummond (colored), served warrants of arrest upon the manager and members of the two teams for playing base ball in violation of the Sunday law. A trial, which developed into a complete farce, followed, during which the spectators unmercifully guyed the justice and sheriff. Each participant in the game was fined $2 and costs, amounting to $4, which was promptly paid. The game was then continued, and warrants were made out against Secretary Burkett, of the Washington club, on the charge of playing ball without a license. Burkett, however, learned of this move, and quickly drove to this city, with the sheriff in pursuit. He will probably be arrested to-morrow morning to answer Barnie and Catcher Tate, of the Balti-more Base Ball club, were arrested after to-day's game, charged with vio-lating the Sunday laws. Both men gave bail and were released. The Picketts Beaten.

the symptoms given by the patient Dr. Well concluded that there must be an outside irritant causing the troubles. He made a local examination, and, to his antonishination, and, to his antonishment, felt imbedded in a thick layer of skin over the forehead some hard object. This he removed by a simple surgical operation, and the object proved to be a small bullet from a revolver. This had been lodged, it appears, for over twenty years, at or, near the spot over twenty years at or near the spot where finally recovered. And thereby

During a morning walk a merchant who was detained by business in Amsterdam came to a group of men who sterdam came to a group of men who were standing around a well, into which a strongly-built man had just been let down, says an exchange. A pipe, whose mouth was at the top of the well, had been opened, and a stream of water from it was flowing down into the well and beginning gradually to fill it. The fellow below had quite enough to do, if the did not want to be drowned, to keep the water out by means of a pump the water out by means of a pump which was at the bottom of the well. "Sir," replied an old man standing near, "that man is healthy and strong. I have myself offered him work twenty times, nevertheless he always allows laziness to get the better of him, and will make any excuse to beg his bread from door to door, though he might easily earn it himself by work if he liked. We are now trying to make him feel that he can work. If he uses the strength which is in his arms he will be saved; if he lets them hang idle he will be drowned. But look," continued the old Dutchman, as he went to the edge of the well, "the fellow finds out that he has got muscles: in an hour we shall let him out with better resolutions for the future." Such was the case and the out with better resolutions for future." Such was the case, and the cure was effectual.

THE MARQUIS OF ALCANTARA.

From the Spanish.

The old Marquis of Alcantara was one of the wealthiest noblemen of Spain. His vineyards were extensive, and his wine was celebrated throughout the was celebrated throughout the downward way, while Pedro resumed by a capacity of the secont. of the wealthiest noblemen of Spain. His vineyards were extensive, and his wine was celebrated throughout the land—so famous, in fact, that it is even said that the king praised it one evening while at dinner.

The marquis was proud of his wine, but he was prouder still of his good name; and his pleasant ways and charitable acts procured for him the love and esteem of all who knew him, rich or poor. His life was one of religious devotion to his church and God, and what with health, wealth, education, a clean conscience and a noble name, he ought to have been, and in fact was, resonably happy.

To be sure, he had never experienced the blisses attendant upon married line; but he had avoided its ills as well. As the marquis had remained single he had, according to the custom of Spain, rented the upper portion of the mansion in which he lived to lodgers, and while this tended to make the old house lively, he also derived a small income from the rents.

No one was more regular at mass and vespers, and no one ate less meat on Friday than the good old Marquis of Alcautara, Knight of the Golden Fleece, whose name and ancestry penetrated far back into the romantic and medieval Castile. But while the marquis loved to do good to all about him, and no one could say a bad word about him, he had one fault, for he was very vain, and it is said that every morning upon ne had one fault, for he was very vain, and it is said that every morning upon rising he would stand admiring himself in a mirror, and he was heard many times to exclaim, with rapture, "Sebastian, you are handsome! You are noble! You are a Spaniard! What more could you want?"

you want?"

This fault became excusable when his good works and model life were so apparent to everybody. The lodgers in the old mansion seldom saw their landlord except on rent day, when they were always received kindly and given a glass of some of the marquis' rare old wine, but outside of this they lived in wine, but outside of this they lived in an entirely different sphere.

The front apartments were let to a certain Roderigo, who generally spent the greater part of the days and often the nights in quarreling with his wife. When a young man, he had married a woman of shrewish temperament, who had, up to the time of her death, which occurred about two years before the time of which we are speaking, made his life unbearable with her continued scoldings and angry words. It must be admitted that when she passed into the other world he did not mourn for her very much. Not being possessed of the discernment necessary in the selection of a good wife, he had rushed headlong into matrimony again, and two months after the demise of his first wife he had married a second. She was a young girl of sixtes according to the discernment processed and the second with the had probably misried a second. She was a young girl of sixteen, and what he had probably mis-taken for amuability previous to mar-riage was found lacking after the knot was tied. She proved to be even worse than the first one, and in a letter he wrote to a friend he acknowledged that he loved his first wife far better than he solitary. he was much given to thought, and he often mused over the sayings of the priest, which were a great solace to him, for it must be said that these were the only comforting or encouraging words he ever heard. It gave him courage to hear from the lips of the holy father that in heaven all men would be equal, and though he was only a poor cobbler, he would, when in heaven, be able to walk in eqality with even the Marquis of Aleantara or his majesty of Spain, as a reward for his well conducted life.

span, as reward to his were conducted life.

At last he died, alone in his garret, with no friend to smooth the pillow of pain or drop a tear for him after his spirit had fled, for, although he had always loved his fellow being, his eccentricities had been so great that he was thought by many to be partially insane, and was shunned accordingly.

Following Pedro's spirit after it had left his body, we go from the realms of mortal existence up the straight and narrow path which leads to the golden gate, toward which Pedro was slowly and painfully trudging. The rocks over which he was forced to clamber were rough and precipitous, and the road which he was forced to clamber were rough and precipitous, and the road was steep and scarcely distinguishable in the deep gloom which hung about. He trudged painfully along until at last from sheer weakness he had nearly lost heart, and had almost resolved to cast himself over a precipice; when he saw some one in the distance coming down the road at full speed. The man or angel, whoever he was, seemed to be or angel, whoever he was, seemed to be weeping and tearing his hair, and he was gesticulating wildly as he ran. was gesticulating wildly as he ran.

moment, and caught the cloak of the flying figure, when he found to his utter astonishment that it was no other than his fellow lodger, Roderigo, who had died some time previous to himself. After the latter became calmed a little, Pedro asked him why he was journeying in the wrong direction, for instead of nearing the inviolate region he was rapidly approaching the infinite depths. "Alas! alas!" cried Roderigo. "I will tell you of my experience, and, perhaps, by a timely warning you may be saved from a similar fate."

He then continued: "After leaving purgatory I climbed up this rugged path and at last came in sight of the gates of the Celestial City. Outside were vast numbers of people on the same errand as myself, and St. Peter, with his keys in one hand and a notebook in the other, leaned out of the little wicket which served as a booking office up there, and glared at the drowd in a very unfriendly manner, and frequently spoke to them in reference to the earthly noise they were making."

At last he formed them into a line, and overy men had to year that little after that, with my two marriage cer-tificates to show and the shrewish dis-position of my wives to bring up, and when my turn came I was perhaps over-confident, for upon being asked if I was ever married, I replied hastily.

"Oh, yes; twice, your holiness."
"Never mind, then," said St. Peter.
"I don't want to examine you any more. You can go, for we don't want any fools last look through the wicket to see if there were any more people waiting. On seeing Pedro he cried impatiently: "Oh! you here still? I quite forgot about you," and he opened the gate just wide enough for the poor fellow to squeeze through.

After he was once inside Pedro gazed about him in a vacant sort of way for a few moments, and then instead of rejoicing, he hung down his head in silence.

why! what's the matter my good man?" asked the archangel; "you don't seem to be very glad to get to heaven. "Most men are."

"Yes," returned Pedro, "I'm glad enough to get in, but I would like to have one thing explained to me."

"And what may that be?" asked the gaint.

"And what may that be?" asked the saint.
"Well," continued Pedro, falteringly,
"While I was on earth I had a life of hardship and sorrow, with nothing to sweeten the hours of toll, but the one thought of heaven, where the priest told me that no matter how great the difference of earthly position, all men would be equal. It seems to me that this is not so, for while waiting outside the gate just now I saw the Marquis of Alcantara ride up and give his full list of titles, and, on learning who he was, you admitted him in the grandest possible style, with music and rockets and all that sort of thing.

shudder," and the lost soul went on his downward way, while Pedro resumed his ascent.

This adventure made a deep impression upon Pedro, and he became melancholy at the thought of poor Roderigo burning in the flames forever; still he trudged on, every foot of the road seeming harder to climb, until at length he reached the fourth milestone from heaven. Being very weary, he sat himself down to rest for a short time, leaning his back against the stone. He had been there but a short time when, to his great surprise, sounds of weeping seemed to como from the other side of the stone, and upon getting up to reconnoitre (for the stone was very large) he was astonished to see Juan, the gambler and lover of bull fights, stretched upon the ground weeping piteously. At the sight of Pedro he rose and flung his arms around the old cobbler's neck, saying between his sobs that he was thankful for meeting an old acquaintance in that dismal spot. In answer to Pedro's sympathetic questioning he told the following story:

"You may, perhaps, remember," said he, "that I died about a week before you did, and I made up my mind then that I stood no show of getting to heaven, but it was no harm to try and so I climbed this hilly road, and finally succeeded in reaching the much-wished-for place. music and rockets and all that sort of thing.

"Now, I'll admit that this marquis was a very good man below, but so was I, and still you force me to wait and wait, and when at last you do let me in the gate is only opened just wide enough for me to elbow through. Now—"

"You do not understand the matter at all," interrupted the saint kindly.

"You do not understand the matter at all," interrupted the saint kindly.
"Once you are in here neither the marquis nor any one else is your supe. for.
You are now the equal of everyone in paradise, but while we have poor men coming here by the thousands every day it is just 1,500 years since a nobleman of any rank ever got to heaven, and we were forced to make some kind of a jubilee on the occasion." so I climbed this hilly road, and finally succeeded in reaching the much-wished-for place.

"There were a dozed people lounging about outside the gate, and so I merely counted as one more.

"All were evidently waiting for the wicket to open, and signs of impatience were noticeable all about me. When at last the time came for opening the wicket, St. Peter looked out and counted all those who were waiting with his wicket, St. Peter looked out and counted all those who were waiting, with his long, bony forefinger, pointing it at each one separately. After this he smoothed h's great flowing white beard once or twice, and remarked that all was ready, while one of the angels set the gate ajar.

"The examination began, and I felt even more nervous, than before for St. was ready, while one of the angels set the gate ajar.

"The examination began, and I felt even more nervous than before, for St. Peter seemed to be particularly severe on card playing and drinking, and seeing that there was no chance for me to pass the examination satisfactorily, I resolved to use stratagem, and while he was examining the hearts of the others I quietly slipped inside the gates, as I thought, unobserved.

Once inside I started off at a grand pace over the gold and jasper, feeling that if I reached the heavenly city my place would be secured for all time to come, as I would never be discovered. I was destined to disappointment, for, as I heard afterward, I had not been inside the gate a minute when old St. Peter exclaimed: "Why, how is this? There is a mistake somewhere, for there were thirteen here a moment ago and now there are only twelve," and he counted them all again with his lanky forefinger. The next minute he said:

"Oh! I know what the matter is. It's one of those fellows from Madrid who has slipped inside the gate. I think I can bring him out again, however," and the white-haired doorkeeper chuckled inwardly, and, turning to an angel who was standing near by, said: "Gabriel, step outside the gates and sound the call for a bull fight."

"All of this was, of course, entirely unknown to me at that time, and the first thing I knew the ringing notes of a trumpet calling the people to a bull fight struck in upon my ears like a bomb. I never shall. Moreover, at that time I was curious to know what sort of a bull fight they had in heaven; so I turned back and ran at full speed toward the sound, wherever that might be. Suddenly, to my chagrin and astonishment, I found myself outside the gates, which I had passed in my senseless rush, and there stood St. Peter waiting for me with a sardonic smile on his face.

""Aha!" he cried. 'So you would even lately been discussed by French and English naturalists. M. G. de Mortillet, in a paper read before the Anthropological society of Paris, assuming from negative evidence the non-existence of the dog in the earlier Quafrom negative evidence the non-existence of the dog in the earlier Quaternary epoch, traces his presence onward from the shell heaps of Denmark, in which his remains commonly occur. Passing from the prehistoric ages in Europe, he considers at length the evidence that can be advanced of the existence of several varieties of the dog among the Egyptians, and later on among the ancient Greeks and Romans, and in the fact of the innumerable varieties of canis domesticus the author believes we have one of the most conclusive proofs of evolution. Messrs. Winder and Humphreys have also read a paper before the Zoological Society, of London, on some cranial and dental characters of the domestic dog, based on the results of the measurements of a large number of dogs' skulls of various breeds. Its object was to ascertain whether cranial and dental characteristics afforded sufficient information to permit of a scientific classification of the breeds or would throw any light upon their origin. "The conclusion so far arrived at was was that inter-breeding had been so extensive and complicated as to make it impossible to distinguish the various forms scientifically from the characters examined." A. D. Bartlett, the veteran keeper of the zoological gardens of London, at a later date brought before the Zoological society some observations on wolves, jackals, dogs and foxes. His remarks tended to show that all the varieties of domestic dogs owe their origin to wolves and jackals, and that the habit of barking has been acquired by and under the influence of domestication. He also maintained that the dog is the most perfectly domesticated of all animals.

"That is how," said Juan in conclusion, "I was cast out of heaven and ordered down to hades for all eternity."

Of course Pedro felt very sorry for his fellow-lodger, who, though of a somewhat thoughtless disposition, he did not believe to be really bad. He had received his sentence from which there was no appeal, and Pedro was forced to leave him and continue his way.

At last he came in sight of the pearly gates, and he was truly tnankful that his journey was almost over.

Here was the goal for which he had striven all of his long life, the palace of delight, which could only be entered by followers of the faith, and where all men were equal.

There was no one in sight, and the wicket was closed, so the poor cobbler sat himself down upon a hard bench and waited for the wicket to open. "Well! what is it?" he heard a harsh voice exclaim, and the next minute St. Peter appeared at the window. "Well! what do you want?" repeated the saint.

"I hope your holiness is well." said the poor cobbler, who thought that by being very polite he could perhaps soften the harsh words and looks.

"Yes, I'm very well," replied the saint. "But what do you want?"

"And I hope your family is well, your holiness," persisted the lithe cobbler.
