close to the diocesan council which had been in session Tuesday and yesterday morning. The programme yesterday afternoon consisted of a series of addresses that were largely personal reminiscences concerning the beginning of Episcopal work in Minnesota and the people prominently connected with it. Bishop Whipdethemane church, in Minneapolis. But besides there there were six missionaries of the board of missions, laboring at various points, and there was also the associate mission. The associate mission and the Indian work were supported entirely through the correspondence of Rev. J. Lloyd Breck, the head of the work. Of the three parishes, none of which received aid from the domestic board, one had been in existence a single year, a second had lately become independent, while the third reported in 1858 a total offering of $262.92. Practically, therefore, the entire territory of Minnesota was missionary ground. The na-tive-born population in 1850 was about 50,000. In that year one-third of the population was reckoned as foreign born. The total number of communicants was about 500, or one to every 500 of the American population. Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper was missionary bishop of the territory, residing at Delafield, Wis.

Work in the Diocese Through Forty Years."

Through a misunderstanding the attendance was light. It had been announced that the bishop would speak this evening, but the date was changed and evidently but comparatively few of the parishioners heard of it.

The bishop drew from his experience many incidents to show the zeal of the pioneers in mission work in the early years of his labors in Minnesota, and particularly dwelt upon the work in behalf of the Indian and the early struggles to maintain the Shattuck school. The bishop was listened to with wrapt attention, and urged to continue when he expressed fear that he was holding his audience too long. AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHERS.
