

A PORTABLE WATER FILTER.

A Handy Little Contrivance that May Be Carried in the Pocket or Satchel.

Railroad water being often very bad, not a few travelers will be glad to know of a convenient portable filter that can be carried in the pocket or traveling satchel, and seems to act as a perfect cleanser. Such a one, which is also convenient for a variety of uses, is described by Popular Science News as follows:

For filtering ordinary hydrant water it is immersed in a vessel containing the water, and enough suction made on the tube to make a siphon action, and, by allowing the vessel to remain under the hydrant, an unlimited supply can be obtained, though of course in hot a large stream. It can be used by dropping it in a spring or other water, and by suction a fair drinking stream can be obtained.

A rather wide mouthed bottle containing an ounce or two is the best. A piece of glass tubing sufficiently long to reach the bottom and extend to the top or above about one-half an inch. A piece of black rubber tubing such as is used on nursing bottles is drawn over the end at the mouth of the bottle. Absorbent cotton is then tightly packed around the glass tube, which rests on the bottom of the bottle. Pack the bottle to the top. If desired, when about half full, a layer of charcoal can be put in and the cotton packing continued. A small package of cotton will last a long while for re-packing, as only the top layers of cotton need be removed and replaced by new for a considerable period. About two feet of rubber tubing is all that is necessary. The variations that can be made are obvious. A much larger one, containing cotton, gravel and charcoal, has been in use successfully for several months. It is, first of all, clean, for we can see when it becomes foul; its portability is unquestioned and its ease of renewing is quite apparent.

College Men with Big Heads.

Mr. Francis Galton is quoted as authority for the following conclusions in regard to the size of the brain in university students:

Although it is pretty well ascertained that in the masses of the population the brain ceases to grow after the age of nineteen, or even earlier, it is by no means so with university students.

That men who have obtained high honors have had, on the average, considerably larger brains than others at the age of nineteen.

That they have, on the average, larger brains than others, but not to the same extent, at the age of twenty-five. In fact, their predomance is at that time diminished to about one-half of what it was.

Consequently, high honor men are presumably as a class both more precocious and more gifted throughout than others. We must therefore look upon eminent university success as largely due to a fortunate combination of these two helpful conditions.

A Freckle Remedy.

The story is told that a South American lady discovered some time ago by accident a veritable remedy for freckles. At a season of great scarcity of water she washed her face one day with the juice of a water-melon. The result was so soothing that she repeatedly washed her face in this manner, and her astonishment was great a few days later on seeing that there was not a freckle left on her previously befreckled face.

COUNTRY VISITING.

The Duties of Hostess and Guest—The Charm of an American Country House.

No one possessed of his senses would invite a person to his country house for the purpose of making him unhappy. At least so one would say at first thought. But it is an obvious fact, according to Mrs. Sherwood, who is authority on manners and social usages, that very many guests are invited to the country houses of their friends and are made extremely miserable while there. They have to rise at unusual hours, eat when they are not hungry, drive or walk or play tennis when they would prefer doing anything else, and they are obliged to give up those hours which are precious to them for other duties or pleasures; so that many people after an experience of visiting are apt to say, "No more of the slavery of visiting for me, if you please!"

"A lady guest," says Mrs. Sherwood, "is apt to be a slave, from the fact that, as yet, the American hostess has not learned that the truest hospitality is to let her guest alone and to allow her to enjoy herself in her own way. A thoroughly well bred guest makes no trouble in a house; she has the instinct of a lady and is careful that no plan of her hostess shall be disturbed by her presence. She mentions all her separate invitations, desires to know when her hostess wishes her presence, if the carriage can take her hither and yon, or if she may be allowed to hire a carriage.

"The charm of an American country house is, generally, that it is a home and sacred to home duties. A model guest never infringes for one moment on the rights of the master of the house. She never spoils his dinner or his drive by being late; she never sends him back to bring her parasol; she never abuses his friends or the family dog; she is careful to abstain from disagreeable topics; she joins his whist table, if she knows how to play; but she ought never to be obliged to rise an hour earlier than her wont because he wishes to take an early train for town. These early morning perfunctory breakfasts are not times for conversation and they ruin the day for many bad sleepers. "There is no office in the world which should be filled with such punctious devotion, propriety and self respect as that of hostess. If a lady ever allows her guest to feel that she is a cause of inconvenience, she violates the first rule of hospitality. If she fails in any way in her obligations as hostess to a guest whom she has invited, she shows herself to be ill bred and ignorant of the best principles of politeness. She might better invite twelve people to dinner and then ask them to dine on the pavement than ignore or withdraw from a written and accepted invitation."
