Meat Extracts in Sickness.

We have witnessed many changes of opinion respecting some of the commonest articles of diet for the sick. The old view that calves'feet jelly was of exceeding nutritive value, was at one time so controverted that the jelly ceased to be much used. It is now sanctioned as having a place in dietetics, and I believe it may be safely regarded as a temporary form of nourishment of no inconsiderable

Beef-tea has been in and out of repute, but we have, or should have, no doubt now as to its stimulant and reparative properties. We cannot think lightly of it as commonly prepared, for it can certainly prove harmful, when not desirable, as in the case of rheumatic fever. I believe it is right to withhold it in such cases Again, it is so far apt to act as an aperient that it is best not to employ it in enteric fever, or in diarrhoea, when the bowels are in an irritable condition. Mutton, veal, or chicken essences can, however, be used, having no such sperient action. We have to distinguish between a dietary suitable for acute disease, when we have to wait and tide over difficulties, and one that may be better adapted to restore a convalescent or weakly patient. The highest nutritive value may not be (I think it is not) the most essential point to have regard to in selecting a dietary in acute diseases. From Dietary for the Sick, by Sir Dyce Duckworth, in The Popular Science Monthly for May.

The Point of Views in Education. The old education takes the standpoint of the adult; the new, that of the child. From the former, the whole mass of heterogeneous facts composing the knowledge to be acquired is viewed as having been classified, labeled, and stored in books. From this conception, what method of acquiring knowledge can be more direct than the memorizing of books? By a cheerful optimism this system crams the child with words, and trusts that somehow he will grasp the ideas for himself and will have his powers cultivated in the process. In exceptional cases these objects are ac complished; but the average child is left in a condition of permanent mental dyspepsia and torpor. The new education conceives the child as looking forward into the phenomena of nature and life, curious and eager to know realities first, then to express his knowledge, and delighted with the exercise of his powers. To bring the child into contact with facts, to guide him in classifying and labeling these facts for himself, becomes the teacher's first and chief duty, in obedience to the sound principle that development of powers is gained by their exercise only. From this point of view education is conceived of as a natural process extending from the cradle to the grave, with Nature as the chief teacher, and the mother as the first assistant, whose work is carried on by the schools and the experiences of life. In this natural process of education, ideas come before expressions, whether the idea be the child's first conception of color and form or the profoundest abstraction of a philosopher; and its principles are therefore applicable to education in all grades from the kindergarten to the university.—From the Oswego State Normal School by Prof. WILLIAM M. ABER, in The Popular Science Monthly for May.

A $500,000 Suit.

The big suit of R. H. Wright vs. W. Duke, Sons & Co., for $500,000, is now being heard before Judge Patterson in the Supreme Court of New York. The testimony was concluded Saturday and the argument began today. It is expected that a decision will be reached in a day or so. The New York World, in mentioning the case, says: "Wright testified that he sold his one-fifth interest in the firm in 1885 for $40,-000, though the firm was taken into the cigarette trust in 1889, at a valuation of $7,500,000. The fact, he said, had been concealed from him that the firm had made a contract giving the right to use a machine, a great value in manufacturing cigarettes, at 25 per cent, less costs, than

"Castoria is an excellent medicine for children. Mothers have repeatedly told me of its good effect upon their children.'

DR. G. C. OSGOOD,

"Castoria is the best remedy for children of which I am acquainted. I hope the day is not far distant when mothers will consider the real interest of their children, and use Castoria instead of the various quack nostrums which are destroying their loved ones, by forcing opium, morphine, soothing syrup and other hurtful agents down their throats, thereby sending them to premature graves."
