EXCAVATING AT CASA GRANDE RUINS

beautifully stated the intellectual quality of the ceramic art, the art of pottery making. This requires considerable manual skill, even in its earliest phases; and since pottery is fragile and constantly breaking, the supply of vessels has frequently to be renewed.

Intricate And Varied Patterns
The impermanence of the finished product, the need for continual manufacture, stimulates the imagination. The hand and the mind of the potter were working together and a survey of a well-chosen and well-arranged collection of pottery from our Southwest, whether from the Pueblo or the Colorado river cultures, will impress all with the varied forms, the intricate and beautiful patterns of the decorations, the fascinating development and decline of the different styles and methods of decoration and form.

Awhile back I mentioned our growing interest in the decoration on the pottery which we are finding at Casa Grande ruin. Sometime all who care to see these specimens will find them on display. So far, only potsherds have been found by our party. We have a few sherds with decorations in three and even four colors; more with black designs on white backgrounds but for the most part the patterns are painted in red on buff pottery. While these red designs are, so far, all geometrical, we have already gathered a very interesting variety.

Pottery Making Profession
In the central Gila river culture, we assume that pottery was made by the women, as it generally was throughout the Americas. In Central America and Peru, in prehistoric times, pottery-making ceased to be mere woman's work and became a profession, just as it is today at San Ildefonso and other pueblos in our Southwest.

If the women of the site we are studying made the pottery, it is not surprising that the designs are geometrical and conventionalized, because almost always the women confined themselves to such designs. It was the men who made the realistic portrayals of beasts and birds, etc., except in the very highest developments of decorative art; at least so I understand it.

Basket-making came before pottery-making. As in all weaving, the warp and the woof elements have a geometrical relationship. They are at right angle, one to the other. A design therefore can, in the main, be built up only in equal rectangular units, as Dr. Wissler says. In basket-making diagonals can be run only as steps; this is hard to escape in cloth as well.

What more natural than the designs which women had long woven into baskets should be used on pottery?—The Arizona Republican.
