By Bees, Whose Hives Were Overturned A Stubenville (Ohio) special of the 12th nst, to the Cincinnati Enquirer says: While William Harris and his son James were at the McKim farm, on the West Virginia side of the river, to-day, two horses hitched at the side of the barn slipped their bridles and started to run away. Harris, seeing the runaway, tried to head the horses, causing them to turn and go through a fence into a yard where there were thirty bee-hives. Three hives were knocked over by the horses. At that time thousands of bees swarmed over the horses, who lay down in the harness moaning piteously. As young Harris could not see the horses suffer, he cut the traces with a butcher-knife, while the bees attacked him. He started the horses off. When loose from the cattle-crate the horses ran in all direcions in the field, uttering unnatural squeals, it times rolling in the grass, moaning terribly. One horse lay down in a creek, where it rolled and shricked till death ended its sufferings. The other horse was caught and hay burned under it, but the horse died in a short time. Both were fine animals. Young Harris was stung badly, but he was bathed in a tub of soda-water, counteracting the poison. His stings are not serious.

"Any clew to the owner of this pretty friend, who was carefully scanning the piece of paper.

"Wait, I will tell you directly! Oh! Freda, what is this?"
"Let me see!" replied the girl eagerly; and taking the slip of paper from Mabel's hand, in some excitement she read aloud: Dearest Jack: I cannot refuse to bid you good-by. You will find me on the sands at 6 o'clock this evening. I shall be seated under the Red Cliff. Your sorrowing Evie.

Thursday, 10 A. M.

"This very evening these unhappy lovers were to meet to say adieu; and perhaps the girl dared not venture to speak these few words, and so wrote them. Will she miss this farewell, which might have been her "How sorry I am for her!" breathed Freda Melham softly, thinking of a day, three months ago now, when the "dearest Jack" to whom she was affianced went to New York on business for his father. Had she been prevented from receiving his good-by how could she have borne it? "Now what can we do," said Mabel. "Was it the girl or the young man who lost this purse? The girl may have slipped it into his hand, you know, without having had the opportunity of taking out her little "Ah, yes," returned Freda dreamily. Her sympathy for the young pair about perhaps to be ruthlessly divided increased every moment. What was it that was to part them? Poverty? their parents' refusal to allow their betrothment? or some other adverse circumstance?

"Mabel," said she, suddenly, "I will go to the Red Cliff this evening, and if I see any one there—either the young lady or her affianced—I will venture to speak to

"How I wish I could go with you," said Mabel warmly, "You will tell me all about it to-morrow, wont you? Come early to our house—immediately after break fast."

In a few minutes she reached the sands. The tide was far out by this time, and that part of the headlands called the Red Cliff stood out clear and bright in the evening "Is she there at this moment?" thought Freda, quickening her pace. "Is she or for it had grown a little cold and people no longer loitered about; nor were there any children to be seen along the broad, yellow "How I tremble!" said Freda to herself, as she sped on. The Red Cliff was close at hand now; she had but to turn the corner of a piece of cliff jutting out beyond the line marked by the land jutting upon the Wound up to the highest pitch of excite-wish a great feeling of utsappointment visible enough on her pretty face; for no figure of a lovelorn maiden or of a despairing lover met her view. The solitary cliff stood up before her and silence reigned around, save for the soft, far-away lap of the waves and the nameless voices which reach the listener by the sea.

"No one is here after all—neither he nor she," said the girl, speaking aloud to herself in her excitement. The little green purse was in her hand; her blue eyes searched the deserted strand.

There was a noise, a footstep, and, emerging from the shelter of a projecting boulder, a handsome figure and manly form came face to face with the young girl.

"Pardon me," said he, with courtesy, but in a tone which betrayed emotion, "did you expect to meet any one here to-night? you expect to neet any one here to-night?
Did you expect to see a lady?"
"I did not know whether it would be a but pray explain. And is it possible that you have found that purse?"

"Yes—yes. Oh, is it yours? How fortunate that I came here after ali!" exclaimed she, with vivacity.

With heightened color she tended the pretty bauble; with deepening emotion he "I-I lost this a short time after it was

And then, with graceful courtesy, she smiled and walked away from the Red Cliff, wishing that she could have seen the stranger—wishing that she could know the end of their sorrowful romance.

"They are both together now—at least they will have the consolation of exchanging a few words, of feeling the clasp of each other's hands, of promising eternal truth to one another! Oh, why doesn't my Jack write? America is not so far off but that he could let me have his letters oftener!"

A soft gloom was gently creeping over the before bright sky; a purple tint tinged the hitherto blue waters; a mysterious beauty lay upon the sea.

"How manly he looked! How handsome! Is she whom he loves as fair and as noble of soul as I am sure that this stranger is? How will it end for both of them? And oh, is my Jack as fond ot me as he is of her? He and she. I can call them by no other name."

An hour passed by unconsciously as she lingered by the shore. From afar her eyes sought the Red Cliff. Surely she should presently discern two figures leaving the shore, and these would be the two lovers, so soon to be parted, yet so true in their affection. Freda felt as if she could not go away till her eyes had tracked their path.

Freda felt as if she could not go away till her eyes had tracked their path. But it was growing late. The lovely purple of the sea was changing to a dimmer line; the clearness of the sky was slowly being shrouded by approaching twilight. "I must go without seeing him again, without seeing her. Farewell. May happiness come to you in some anforeseen way; and may my Jack come home to me soon. Then I shall no longer wait and watch for letters that never come."

Sighing, she turned to quit the place, and as she did so, discerned a figure hurrying across the shorte toward her, and in a few minutes the young man she had encountered at the Red Cliff came up to her.

"She has not been! She did not come! she has deceived me! Why did she write me that letter?" cried he, excitedly. Then recollecting himself: "Forgive me! what right have I to thrust my private crief upon your notice? Because you wished to aid two people emitrely unknown to you, are you to be troubled by insane complaints?"

A FEMALE STOWAWAY.

Captain Nicholas Bichard received word yesterday that his bark, the Malay, arrived at Victoria from Samoa on Monday. Three days after she left Samoa a young Samoan girl, 20 years old, was found stowed away in the hold. The girl was taken to Victoria and will be brought on the bark down to this port whence she will probably be shipped back to her island home. The steamer Haytian Republic, Captain Brown, will sail to-day for Port Townsend and other ports on the Sound. Over a hundred tons of freight more than she can carry was offered her, and Getz Bros. are con-sequently happy. The Laura Madsen, which is also loading freight for the Sound at Mission No. 1, has more freight offered than she can take. She will sail to-morrow. The Pacific Mail steamer San Bias, hence, arrived at Panama on the 12th, and the China arrived at Yokohama on the 17th.

Island. Captain Albert Erickson of the schooner stood over that way and found about four fathoms of a fisherman's net. It was floated by the corks attached, and wrapped in its folds was a seal about five feet in length that was thrashing around vigorously. The seal had evidently approached the net and seized a salmon, as the remains of the latter could be seen. Its hind fin had then got caught in a mesh, and in its struggles it had broken off and carried away a large piece of the net.

Captain Erickson passed a bowline around the net and seal, and after some difficulty got them on board. The animal fought furiously and tried to bite the sailors. It was lashed to the rail to prevent its jumping overboard. On arriving at Beale-street Wharf the captain found he had an elemphant on his hands, as the crew could not discharge the cargo with the seal having charge of the deck. Two young men who were on the dock offered to take charge of the animal and remove it to Woodward's Gardens. An express wagon was procured and the seal hoisted into it clear of the net.

Gardens. An express wagon was procured and the seal hoisted into it clear of the net. It fought savagely and had to be lashed down to prevent its getting over the back of the wagon. The net awaits an owner at Beale-street Wharf.

ACCIDENT ON THE DON NICOLAS.

Yesterday afternoon the rudder of the bark Don Nicolas was unshipped so as to be repaired. It was floated alongside and a tackle rigged from the mainyard to hoist it onto Fremont-street Wharf. The fall was led to the winch and the donkey-engine commenced to hoist. Freischnitz Anderson, a sailor, was taking in the slack from the winch, and leaned over to take another turn when he was caught and taken over
