He Wouldn't Lie.

a reporter overheard a well-known actor describe the fishing experience of a brother artist. He said that his friend went to one of the lakes of upper New York with as fine an outlit as there was in the whole north territory. He had split bamboo rods, a book of the choicest flies, a charming and well stocked lunch basket, with a good sized fire extinguisher, with a silver cup fitted over the bottom, and a fish basket that any trout should feel proud to occupy.

The morning after his arrival at the hotel he donned his fishing suit, hung his lunch basket on one side and his fishbasket on the other, refilled his fire extinguisher, and taking his best rod and book of flies, started for a secluded part of the lake, where curious eyes might not be too inquisitive as to his luck. He saw a country lad with a straw hat and a freckled face sitting on a little dock away from the road, and as the little fellow already had a pretty good string of fish, did not hesitate to sit beside him and endeavor to entice the fish away from that poor country boy. But somehow or other the five-ounce rod and the gaudy flies had no charm for those sh. They preferred the juicy garden worm that concealed the point of a bent pin attached to the string that dangled from a freshly cut alder stick in the hands of that freckled urchin of the farm. Presently he said, "Little boy, would you mind changing places with me? I don't seem to have any luck here." "Not at all," said the boy. It was a cunning device of that wicked man to cheat the poor country boy out of his well stocked hole. But it didn't seem to work, for the fish still followed the bent pin and spurned the gaudy morsel offered by the giddy actor. Then the boy grew tired of fishing and gathered up his tackle, counted a big string of speckled beauties, and tying another knot in his single suspender, was about to start for home when the actor again spoke to him.

"Little boy," said he, "would you like to sell your fish?"

"Don't mind," was the laconic

"How much?"

"Dollar." "All right," and the crisp greenback was transferred to the little country boy's pocket. He was just going to hand them to his customer, when that good man again spoke and said:

"No, no, little boy. Don't hand them to me, but just stand where you are and I'll stand here, and you throw them over to me; then when I go back to the house I can swear that I caught them."
