To the French People.

Ay, trample on that prostrate throne,
And bow like slaves no longer;
Your tyrant from his nest has flown,
And liberty grows stronger.

Strike boldly for your freedom, now—
Let nothing check or blind you,
Furrow the soil—drive on the plow,
Nor look in fear behind you.

Millions, in Europe, on you bend
Their eyes with anxious yearning;
Millions their galling chains to rend
In bloody strife and burning.

Oh, hear ye not the exultant cry,
Of our own eagle, rising
Against the archives of the sky,
At freedom's new baptizing?

How proudly soars he, while with fear
Old Europe's kings are quaking;
Earth has no music for his ear,
Like that of fetters breaking.

With quivering wing and fiery glance,
With olden memories glowing,
He looks forth to his brother France,
Where martyrs' blood is flowing.

He waits to see you proudly march,
With freedom on your banners—
And hear, from the o'erhanging arch,
Echo your loud hosannas.

Then rise before the expectant world,
All legal power defying;
While despots from their thrones are hurled,
And tyranny is dying!
